

Process Book | Jocelin Flora

Menu

What matters to me in a website is the ease of navigating around the whole website and the graphics.

7. How often do you make decisions based on a website's look?

I would say I always base my decision on the appearance of the website because I don't like to read, to me a picture speaks a thousand words.

8. Do you usually go for visuals first or information?

I would look at the visuals first since if there is too much writing I would probably overlook it and might even exit out of the website. .

9. Would you let your students take a glassblowing course/class?

No, that would be dangerous especially with the heated instruments and fire that is involved along with the danger of breaking the glass which is likely with my students.

Takeaways

Looking at these two interviews, both a teacher and a student were primary users that fit in the user group of the UrbanGlass organization. Interviewing a teacher helped me see a viewpoint of an adult that is in charge of studnets and children especially with classes provided with pretty risky equipment that could be dangerous. It was a hard tiny getting a rid on Elena since alot of her answers were generic but comparing with the student that I interviewed, I was able to see that they both think alike and have some of the same viewpoints.

After finishing the interview with Megan Davis, I got a lot of information on her thoughts of UrbanGlass especially since I could read her well which I believe wad since I was relatively her same age. I remember vividly that I asked if she would take a UrbanGlass class and she replied that